There is nothing more important to us than the safety and health of our workforce and our communities. This remains Imperial's priority as we continue to take actions to prevent further spread of COVID-19. There have not been any new cases associated with our Kearn operation since mid-May and the outbreak designation by Alberta Health Services has now ended. We greatly appreciate the rapid response and outstanding support by Alberta Health Service, as well as the efforts by our workforce to adhere to all prevention measures, which has contributed to the prevention of new cases.

Despite this, however, we have not let our guard down. We will continue to adhere to strict preventative measures and safeguards at site. We continue to work closely with Alberta Health Service and other provincial authorities and are following their guidance. We are committed to remain vigilant as we know that the situation could change quickly. As part of these efforts, we made COVID-19 testing available to all employees and contractors onsite at Kearn regardless of whether they are showing any symptoms.

We recognize there are questions about the workers at Kearn who travel to and from other provinces. For privacy reasons, we do not disclose these workers locations. We do continue to remind workers to follow all public health guidance and do their part to help prevent the spread of COVID-19. In April, we changed our shift rotation to ensure workers returning to their home provinces can follow self-isolation requirements where required. Our employees are providing an essential economic service to the province and country, and we take this responsibility very seriously and continue to take all steps to protect our workforce, their families and our communities.
